“What must I do? If only I knew the will of God, I would be willing to do it. But things are so complex, and God’s will is difficult to discern.” There are times when it all seems clear. The heart moves. We know in our bones what must be done. Like the lawyer, we see the law so simply drawn: “You shall love your neighbor as yourself.” Ah, but the living of it, that is the problem, to will the act, to do it. There’s the rub. Even after hearing the story, we repeat the question, who, indeed, is our neighbor? Surely not the people in our streets. Surely not the poor. Surely not this particular person here and now before me. And there are many reasons not to stop. I may get sued. Others will come to help. I’m in a hurry. Charity begins at home. How well I know the excuses. It was such as I who passed the broken man on the road to Jericho. And I have done the same. I had things to do. He might be part of a racket. He will only want more. Others will expect as much from me. My help will only perpetuate his helpless condition. My pittance will do nothing in the long run. So I, the priest and teacher, passed him by, trying not to notice. It was not the first time. Nor was it the last. My seeming inability to be a neighbor is hard to reconcile with my professed desire to follow Christ. The will of God still draws close and clear, nudging my heart. And yet I seem at a loss as to the doing of it. The peace I seek is beyond my reach, exceeding both my virtue and my will. And in those sadly familiar moments when I inspect the abyss between the holy desires God has placed deep in my soul and the sorry fruit of them, I can only realize once again that I will never find peace or reconciliation on my own. Let the unrest continue, so that, as journeys to Jericho recur in my life, I realize that the only times I will find my neighbor are when I am generous enough to become one.

INTENTION FOR TODAY: That we may embody God’s mercy in our service to one another and to all those we encounter regardless of nationality, race or religion ...

GOSPEL REFLECTION

Who is your neighbor? Israelites were to love other Israelites and resident aliens as they do themselves. The fact that a Samaritan is the one who attended to the injured man is astonishing in itself but that he went far beyond what was expected is amazing. A neighbor is not simply someone in need. How will we go beyond what is expected to care for and assist others? The law of God’s mercy is written in our hearts. How will we respond?
