Matthew 5:13-16 Salt has various uses: a seasoning, a preservative, and an ingredient for fuel. As salt seasoned and preserved food, and as it keeps a fire burning in an even, extended manner, the disciples were to improve the tone of society ("season" it), preserve faith, and extend the fire of the Spirit through their evangelization efforts.

What good works were the disciples to perform? Since Matthew wrote for a Jewish-Christian audience that kept the Law, his stress had to go beyond the everyday expectations of Palestinian culture. Simply keeping the Law, even in the strict manner of the Pharisees, would not cause others to notice.

Also the salt referred to the leveling agent for paddies made from animal manure, the fuel for outdoor ovens used in the time of Jesus. People would form paddies with animal dung, mix in salt, and let the paddies dry in the sun. When the fuel paddies were lit in an oven, the mixed-in salt would help the paddies burn longer, with a more even heat.

When the salt block was spent, they would throw it out onto the road to harden a muddy surface. Jesus saw his followers as leveling agents in an impure world. Their example would keep the fire of faith alive even under stress. Their example would spread faith to those mired in the cultural "dung." But if their example rang empty, they were worthless; they would be dug into the mud under the heels of critics. Jesus also saw his followers as the light of a fire to the world. Placing a fire under a basket would put the fire out. No, like a city high on a hill, the fire should be placed for all to see. One must show faith in action for all to see, so those seeing the witness can be brought to faith and praise God.

In essence, Jesus told his followers they cannot have it both ways. One cannot believe as a Christian, yet act as if faith did not matter. Faith leads to action and the action points to the Kingdom.
